

Chapter 107-2

After a long while, Xu Qingzhu finally spoke languidly. Her cool voice was lazy, the ending tone lifting with a hint of teasing: "Teacher Liang."

Liang Shi glanced at her.

Xu Qingzhu smiled: "Why are you getting worked up over someone who's lost their memory?"

Liang Shi: "....."

The other person had forgotten you, yet you still remember her!

And she's even your favorite person!

This didn't make sense.

But Liang Shi didn't say anything, quietly waiting for Xu Qingzhu to continue.

Sure enough, after a moment, Xu Qingzhu's voice became even more languid. When she spoke, her words ran together, carrying a bit of alluring tenderness: "What I've always liked is —"

She drew out her tone, those beautiful eyes landing on Liang Shi for just a moment before moving away.

This pause made her words even more convincing, almost enunciated word by word.

She said: "Cherishing the person in front of me."

//

Who the person in front of her was—that went without saying.

Liang Shi's mood improved greatly because of those five characters. After closing the car window, she even changed the car music to a slow rock song.

They quickly arrived at Yujiang Bridge. Along the way, they passed by her neighborhood. Liang Shi suddenly remarked: "After we moved here, it seems like we've never actually walked across that bridge."

Xu Qingzhu nodded: "We've both been too busy."

The direction of Xu Qingzhu's company didn't require crossing the bridge, and although Liang Shi often drove out, she had never been on that bridge either.

They had only looked down at the full view of the bridge from home. Sometimes when spacing out, they would stand there watching the scenery on the bridge for a long time—not just watching the flow of the river, but also the people and cars coming and going on the bridge. They would watch for more than half an hour at a time.

Even so, they had never actually walked across this bridge.

Driving onto the bridge was completely different from the angle of looking down from their building. The scenery they saw was also completely different.

The speed of the river's flow seemed to slow down. The cars nearby were moving very fast, but the pedestrian paths on both sides of the bridge seemed unusually slow.

Liang Shi sat in the passenger seat, continuously looking at both sides. When the car had driven halfway across, Liang Shi said: "I see her."

You couldn't stop on the side of the bridge for long—three minutes of temporary parking at most.

After Xu Qingzhu pulled over to the side, she let Liang Shi get out, then drove the car off the bridge.

Liang Wanwan was wearing a thin white shirt, high-waisted jeans, white sneakers, with her hair in a bun, exposing her smooth forehead. It was a very youthful and innocent college student outfit. The collar of her white shirt even had a black bow tie.

The shirt was billowing in the wind. Just looking at her made you feel cold.

Liang Shi jogged over and called out: "Wanwan."

Liang Wanwan, who had been looking down at the ground, finally raised her head. When she saw it was Liang Shi, tears immediately gathered in her already red eyes and fell without hesitation.

She raised the back of her hand to wipe them away, then stood up from the bench.

Liang Shi took out tissues from her pocket, pulled one out, folded it, and handed it to her.

Liang Wanwan wiped her tears before calling out in a choked voice: "Jie."

Her cheeks were red from the cold. Her nose was even redder than her cheeks. All the skin that was exposed had turned red, and there was a fine layer of goosebumps on her neck from the cold. She couldn't help but shiver while talking to Liang Shi.

She looked cold just watching her.

Haizhou City's weather was already approaching winter. Although it was a coastal city, it was classified as northern in terms of regional planning.

In these last days of autumn, the nighttime temperature could drop below zero at any time.

But Liang Wanwan was wearing a summer white shirt.

Liang Shi also understood how these young girls dressed—wearing little underneath and a thick coat on the outside. Once they went indoors and took off the heavy coat, they'd be a slender fairy again.

But that was only for winter.

In late autumn, Haizhou City's indoor temperature was sometimes even worse than outdoors.

Liang Shi couldn't understand these young girls, but at the end of the day, it was all about looking beautiful. Looking at her two slender legs in light-colored jeans, Liang Shi guessed she wasn't wearing long underwear underneath—just thin jeans.

No wonder she was cold.

Liang Shi didn't ask about those matters first. She took off her own coat and draped it over Liang Wanwan's shoulders. "How long have you been here?"

"I don't know," Liang Wanwan said with a snuffle. Her voice was nasally—she sounded like she was about to catch a cold.

Liang Shi asked her: "Are you still going back to school tonight?"

"I don't want to go back." Liang Wanwan looked aggrieved. With reddened eyes again, she said to Liang Shi: "Jie, Chen Mian's sketchbook..."

But Liang Shi interrupted her: "Then come stay at my place tonight?"

She watched Liang Wanwan put on her coat.

Liang Wanwan was much shorter than her—just over 160 centimeters¹. Wearing her coat, the hem fell below her knees, covering half of her calves. The sleeves were also too long.

And after putting it on, she didn't button it up. The cold wind was still rushing in.

Liang Shi couldn't help but frown watching this. She buttoned up the coat—buttons that looked merely decorative—for Liang Wanwan, and also pulled the collar tight, not giving the cold wind any room to breathe.

But Liang Wanwan couldn't hold back a sneeze, getting it all over Liang Shi's hand.

"I'm sorry." Liang Wanwan apologized timidly.

Liang Shi looked down at the back of her hand, helpless: "It's fine."

She wiped it off with a tissue. Liang Wanwan clutched her own collar tightly and said in a low voice: "Is it convenient for you?"

She was asking about the question Liang Shi had asked earlier.

Hearing her words, and thinking back to what she had just said, Liang Shi finally realized something was off.

How had their conversation gotten a bit... strange?

It was like she was bringing her little lover home.

Liang Shi chased those wild thoughts out of her mind and said to her in a low voice: "Your Qingzhu-jie is waiting for us at the bottom of the bridge. Let's go—to my place."

Wearing Liang Shi's coat, Liang Wanwan followed closely behind her, step by step.

Footnotes:

¹ 160 centimeters: Approximately 5 feet 3 inches.