

Chapter 126-1

Winter arrived in Haizhou City without a sound.

Not a single snowfall came—only the heavy rain that night later turned into sleet. The next morning, when people woke up and went to work, they discovered a thin layer of white ice crystals on the ground.

Before the sun could even come out, it had already been washed away by the overnight rainwater.

Then the temperature dropped below zero, cold enough to make people shiver.

The wind hadn't even blown many times.

Counting back, that should have been the biggest rainstorm of the year, as well as the most chaotic wind. That night, thick fog rose on the national highway, and a chain rear-end collision occurred, becoming hot news in Haizhou City.

The next day, many people were discussing that night's storm. Some people's cars were of poor quality and had actually been dented by the hail.

Everyone said the weather that day was absurdly excessive.

The entire Haizhou City was swept into winter by the temperature.

Inside the hospital, it was lunch break time.

Zhao Xuning had just finished her morning shift handover, went home to sleep, and hurriedly took a shower before coming back—her hair was still half-dry.

She first went to Gu Junru's office.

Gu Junru was watering the green plants on the windowsill. The indoor plants received much better treatment than those outside—they were in a greenhouse environment with someone watering them on schedule. It would be hard for them not to flourish.

Seeing her enter, Gu Junru put down the watering can, simply washed her hands, and then put on her white coat, buttoning it while asking: "Why didn't you rest a bit longer?"

"I've rested enough," Zhao Xuning said.

Gu Junru fell silent.

Ever since the kidnapping case happened that day, Zhao Xuning had been appearing at the hospital for increasingly longer periods.

She had personally performed Liang Shi's surgery—four stitches at the collarbone and three stitches on the arm. Both wounds had exposed bone; the wounds were very deep.

In the abandoned factory, Zhao Xuning had only given Liang Shi simple treatment. After sending her to the hospital, she was urgently wheeled into the operating room, and Zhao Xuning changed into surgical attire and directly performed the suturing.

Excessive blood loss required emergency transfusion, but Liang Shi's blood type was Type S-O blood, which was also a relatively rare type. The hospital only had two bags, which were all used on her, but it still wasn't enough.

In the end, a nurse with the same blood type helped with an emergency blood transfusion.

The wounds were sutured properly and everything was handled well, but Liang Shi just wouldn't wake up.

Actually, neither of those two wounds were fatal injuries—one was on the arm and one on the collarbone, and no major blood vessels had been cut. Yet during the resuscitation that day, Liang Shi's heart stopped multiple times.

It was beyond Zhao Xuning's range of understanding—cardiac arrest with absolutely no identifiable cause.

Before they could even use a pacemaker, her heartbeat returned to normal on its own.

It was like someone standing at the edge of a cliff, their body constantly leaning out and pulling back, completely inexplicable by common sense.

It had startled all the doctors and nurses in the operating room.

Fortunately, after the surgery ended, everything returned to normal, and Liang Shi's body was steadily recovering—except she still hadn't woken up.

This was the third day of her coma.

It was the second day since Xu Qingzhu had woken up.

Liang Shi's situation was special, and Xu Qingzhu's situation was also special.

That day in the abandoned factory, Gu Junru couldn't calm Xu Qingzhu's emotions. No matter what she said, Xu Qingzhu couldn't hear it—she had already retreated into her own little world.
