

Chapter 127-2

//

Zhao Xuning taking Xu Qingzhu to see the unconscious Liang Shi was a very bold decision.

Dr. Gu had also considered this approach before, but was afraid that Xu Qingzhu would be impacted again, causing her psychological defenses to crumble once more.

But Zhao Xuning's reason for persuading her was simple: they had to try—things couldn't possibly get worse than they already were.

Dr. Gu agreed, but also made thorough preparations. Her white coat pockets contained both sedatives and suppressants.

Xu Qingzhu's heat period would arrive soon.

Generally, an Omega's heat period lasts 3-7 days. After taking suppressants, they can carry out normal social activities, but need to stay away from Alpha pheromone interference.

Last time, Xu Qingzhu's heat period was forcibly brought forward and lasted only a short time—it ended in just one day.

If this heat period arrived, it would likely make up for the shortened days from last time, and the symptoms would be more intense than any previous time, requiring more powerful suppressants to withstand.

With such preparations in place, Zhao Xuning then took Xu Qingzhu to Liang Shi's hospital room.

Their rooms were only a few dozen meters apart.

Liang Shi's hospital room was empty. The nurse had just changed her dressings, and the wounds on her body were slowly recovering.

Logically speaking, a young Alpha like Liang Shi with good physical constitution would have a significant advantage in wound recovery.

If Liang Shi were awake, eating nutritious meals on time every day with occasional supplementation, the wounds on her body would need only about ten days to mostly recover. But now she was unconscious every day, her blood circulation was slow, and it would take a month to recover.

Currently, the experts in the hospital still couldn't determine the reason for Liang Shi's continued unconsciousness.

The surgery that day had gone relatively smoothly and hadn't injured any vital areas. A CT scan of the brain had been done—no blood clots compressing nerves.

Yet Liang Shi had developed these symptoms.

Fortunately, her body showed no abnormalities. All they could do was wait.

Xu Qingzhu followed Zhao Xuning into Liang Shi's hospital room, expressionless the entire way.

Her face still had no color. She hadn't eaten much since waking up. When she stood and walked, her figure seemed to float. Walking through the hospital corridor in fuzzy slippers, her footsteps couldn't be heard at all.

Like a soulless wandering ghost<sup>1</sup>.

So frail that a gust of wind could blow her away.

Zhao Xuning pushed open the door, and the scene inside the hospital room unfolded before Xu Qingzhu's eyes—a spotlessly clean room, Liang Shi lying quietly on the bed, her long brown curly hair spread across the pillow.

Although Liang Shi was the one who had lost too much blood, her face already had some color—much better than Xu Qingzhu's.

Her lips were a bit chapped, her breathing was even, and her long eyelashes cast a layer of shadow on her lower eyelids.

It was afternoon, and the early winter sunlight fell gently on her, like a beautiful painting with vivid colors.

It looked incredibly healing.

Xu Qingzhu stood at the doorway, not moving for a long time, her expression unchanged.

Zhao Xuning had already entered the room. She took out gloves and put them on, then put on a mask, and moved aside the clothing at Liang Shi's collarbone to check her wounds. The recovery was good—there was no deterioration.

There were benefits to recovering while unconscious—she wouldn't move around randomly.

Liang Shi lay there as if she were just asleep.

After Zhao Xuning finished her examination, she looked at Xu Qingzhu standing at the doorway. Her face hidden behind the mask was cold, but her voice carried a touch of warmth: "Won't you come in and take a look?"

Xu Qingzhu was dazed for a moment, then walked in extremely carefully.

Each step she took was very light, as if afraid of disturbing the person lying on the hospital bed.

Zhao Xuning stepped back half a pace, hands in her coat pockets, her voice muffled: "You can talk to her."

Xu Qingzhu's reaction was muted. Her long, curled eyelashes fluttered lightly a few times, like a butterfly flapping its wings. She sat down on the chair by the hospital bed on her own, lowering her eyes to look at Liang Shi.

She remained calm throughout.

But a few seconds after sitting down, her tears fell pattering onto the back of Liang Shi's hand.

The IV drip on the back of Liang Shi's hand had just finished, and the nurse had forgotten to tuck her hand under the blanket. So all those glistening teardrops fell onto it, landing on those prominent veins.

Zhao Xuning and Gu Junru exchanged a glance from across the room.

Neither of them moved.

1. "Wandering ghost" (阿飄) - A colloquial Taiwanese/Chinese term for ghosts or spirits. The term literally suggests something that floats or drifts, emphasizing the ethereal, weightless nature of ghosts. Here it's used to describe how weak and insubstantial Xu Qingzhu appeared. ⇐
