

Chapter 127-4

//

The doctor came to give Liang Shi a comprehensive physical examination, confirming that her body had no major issues.

It's just that a normal person lying in bed for over three months would inevitably have some problems.

The problem Liang Shi faced was body stiffness—she needed rehabilitation.

Rehabilitation was quite a difficult process. Especially after Liang Shi came back and discovered she had been lying in bed for over three months—even her abs had disappeared from lying down. Her body was too thin, like a paper cutout.

Liang Shi would do rehabilitation for about two hours every day. Because her physical foundation was good, she didn't need to do too many exercises, but Liang Shi would add extra training for herself.

The doctor's recommendation was about two hours, so Xiao Bai would supervise her walking and doing aerobic exercises. But before bed, Liang Shi would always add extra training for herself—planks and sit-ups were the two exercises she did most frequently.

She would push herself to the critical point where her body couldn't handle any more, drenched in sweat, exhausted to the point where she couldn't let her mind wander before she would lie in bed and fall asleep.

Her sleep quality used to be very good, but ever since waking up on this side, her sleep quality had taken a sharp downturn.

Even though she kept adding extra training to exhaust herself, she would often wake up startled in the middle of the night.

After waking, she would instinctively reach for the other side of the bed, and only then suddenly realize—she had returned to this world.

In this world, there was no Xu Qingzhu.

Liang Shi would then lie there with her eyes open in a daze, or lie on her side with her head resting on her arm, her back to the window, trying to fall asleep.

But it was very hard to fall asleep.

She would frequently think of Xu Qingzhu.

Frame by frame, like playing a movie, projecting past moments in her mind.

Liang Shi had also cursed that damn system countless times in the night. It must have been because of that bug that day that it sent her back to this world.

Despite her countless curses, the system never appeared.

The hundred days she experienced seemed like a dream.

A beautiful dream she had woven for herself.

A golden millet dream¹—one day the dream would end.

After just a few days, Liang Shi started thinking—that must have been a dream.

But to categorize Xu Qingzhu as someone she met in a dream—deep down, she didn't want to.

That very real feeling from when she first woke up had already disappeared. Days passed one by one, flying by like arrows.

Liang Shi's life seemed like someone had pressed copy-paste—repetitive and boring.

She would watch TV when she woke up in the morning. Xiao Bai would bring her breakfast and urge her to wash up and eat. Though she clearly had no appetite and didn't want to eat at all, Xiao Bai would sit in front of the hospital bed looking at her with teary eyes.

This scene had often appeared in their previous interactions, but back then it was Xiao Bai not wanting to be scolded by Wang-jie, looking at Liang Shi with teary eyes, hoping she wouldn't have late-night snacks.

Even more so hoping Liang Shi wouldn't touch high-calorie foods like milk tea and fast food.

Now it was reversed. Xiao Bai was painting rosy pictures for her every day: "Liang-jie, when you're discharged, I'll take you to eat McDonald's! KFC! Dicos²! You can eat whatever you want—I'll order fried chicken drumsticks for you! Strawberry taro boba! Two burgers!"

Under her supervision, Liang Shi would finish the breakfast she bought, then go downstairs to walk around the hospital grounds with her company.

Oh right, it was already spring here now.

She had been unconscious on this side for exactly one hundred days too.

For her, the flow of time in both worlds was the same.

When she was unconscious, it was still winter here. When she came back, they had passed Christmas Eve, Christmas, New Year's Day, and Chinese New Year.

In the hundred days she was gone, a year had quietly passed here.

The city Liang Shi was in was a first-tier inland city. Driving for two hours would only get you out of the city to its edges—you couldn't see the vast, azure, endless sea.

It rarely rained here. The few rains that fell only came when needed.

For example, during spring plowing, or when the weather needed to warm up.

The proverb "one spring rain brings one warmth, one autumn rain brings one chill" fit this city very well.

The city that had just had several spring rains was warming up. The spring breeze was much gentler than the autumn wind. The air was too dry, so the humidifier in the hospital room was running twenty-four hours a day.

The weeds on the hospital grounds had already started quietly sprouting. Green new buds had emerged on the withered tree trunks.

Everything showed this city's vitality and vigor.

Liang Shi was quieter than before.

She had always been a person of few words, and now even more so.

When Wang Zhaozhao talked to her, she would often find her spacing out.

Liang Shi did rehabilitation at the hospital for a week. After another full body examination showed all her data and indicators were normal, Xiao Bai went to process her discharge paperwork.

While Xiao Bai was handling the procedures, Liang Shi was already sitting on the bed in a daze, the warm spring sun falling on her.

The orange-brown long hair she had dyed for an event hadn't faded noticeably during these three months. It sparkled under the sun, making her appear even more fair-skinned.

She sat facing the window. The towering buildings of this city were like a steel forest, suffocating to behold.

Gray buildings stood in neat rows on the earth, and the top of the tallest building in the farthest distance nearly touched the clouds.

1. "Golden millet dream" (黃粱大夢) - A famous Chinese idiom originating from a Tang Dynasty story. A young man named Lu fell asleep while waiting for his millet to cook at an inn. He dreamed an entire lifetime of glory—passing imperial exams, becoming an official, marrying well, having children, and eventually dying of old age. When he woke, the millet wasn't even cooked yet. The idiom refers to pipe dreams or the illusory nature of worldly glory and ambitions. ⇐
 2. Dicos (德克士) - A Chinese fast-food chain similar to KFC and McDonald's, known for its fried chicken. It's one of the largest Western-style fast food chains in China. ⇐
