

Chapter 146-2

//

Early the next morning, sunlight streamed in through the gaps in the dark curtains. Downstairs, vehicles began to flow like shuttles, just like the water in the Yu River.

The entire city was like a wind-up gear mechanism—with just a light push, it began to turn.

Xu Qingzhu turned over and instinctively reached for the space beside her, only to find it cold.

Her head hurt so much it felt like it was about to explode.

A hangover was never pleasant, especially when she hadn't drunk any hangover soup the night before.

Having drunk so much alcohol and then standing in the cold wind on a winter night while dressed so thinly—the headache was doubled.

Xu Qingzhu raised her hand to press her temples. She was only wearing a camisole. Her slender, fair arms looked the same as usual, except for a ring of red marks on her wrist and bluish-purple bruises on her elbows.

She had rather sensitive and delicate skin—normally, the slightest touch would turn red.

And everything that happened last night had been forgotten by her.

The problem of blacking out when drunk wouldn't change just because she had done strange things while intoxicated.

In fact, whether beautiful or sad, everything would be forgotten cleanly once she woke up.

Xu Qingzhu glanced at the red marks on her wrist and the bluish-purple bruises on her elbow, unable to recall what had happened last night no matter how hard she tried.

The headache continued.

The room was dim, with no lingering romantic scent.

The space beside her was empty.

Xu Qingzhu wanted to call out for Liang Shi, but found that her voice was so hoarse she could barely make a sound.

Even speaking made her vocal cords ache, and her mouth hurt too.

Her entire tongue was numb. She tried to lick her lips with the tip of her tongue, only to find that she couldn't even manage this simple action.

It was a bit excessive.

But she was certain they hadn't done that last night.

So she was even more curious about what they had done.

She couldn't even remember who she had come home with.

Her memory only went up to going downstairs with her secretary to see off the business partners, and after that, she couldn't remember anything.

Xu Qingzhu wearily leaned against the headboard, pressing her temples, then rubbing her throat. There was a glass of warm water on the nightstand. She picked it up and took a few sips, finally feeling a bit better.

Her ears were sharp, and she could hear faint sounds coming from outside.

So she was certain Liang Shi was home, just not sure what she was doing.

There was the sound of running water, so she wasn't sure if Liang Shi was washing up or cooking in the kitchen.

Meanwhile, she was desperately trying to recall what had happened last night.

The more she tried to remember, the less she could recall.

Eventually, she stopped tormenting herself and put everything out of her mind.

The main thing was the red marks on her wrist—they looked like something had been tied around them.

After a while, Xu Qingzhu discovered a black tie next to her pillow. It was one that matched a shirt of hers, the kind that was half-tied and could be pulled on easily.

The reason she remembered so clearly was because she had bought this shirt near graduation, thinking she would wear it to work.

But she never ended up going to work, though the shirt was still kept.

It had been sitting unused in the closet for a long time.

Yet this tie had suddenly been taken out, and there were signs it had been used—it looked all wrinkled.

Xu Qingzhu frowned as some not-so-innocent scenarios began to appear in her mind.

They were all from her own imagination, but the more she thought about it, the more she blushed.

She thought that if they had really done that, she might have to flee the planet today.

Xu Qingzhu felt her ears burning. She pinched her earlobes, staring at the black tie again and again, before finally tossing it aside and getting out of bed as if escaping.

But she didn't expect her legs to go weak the moment she stood up. She was wearing silk shorts.

At the instant she tried to stand, her knees ached faintly.

Xu Qingzhu sat back down on the edge of the bed. Looking down, she discovered that her knees were also bruised.

Elbows, knees... bruises.

It was really hard not to overthink.

But no matter how much she thought about it, it was all about bedroom activities. Yet Xu Qingzhu didn't think any bedroom exercise could injure her like this.

She lowered her gaze and tried to remember again, but still couldn't.

She had no choice but to give up.

She rubbed her knees, but those bruises weren't going to fade anytime soon.

Seeing all this first thing in the morning put Xu Qingzhu in a rather bad mood.

What made her most uneasy was not being able to remember how she got these marks.

Just as she was feeling distressed, the bedroom door was gently pushed open. Without even turning her head, she knew it was Liang Shi. She just kept her head down, rubbing her knees.

Seeing that she was awake, Liang Shi no longer tiptoed around. She entered the room and walked over to her: "You're awake?"

"Mm." Xu Qingzhu continued rubbing her knees without looking up.

Liang Shi went to pull open the curtains, then bent down and crouched to examine her injuries: "How did it get this serious?"

Xu Qingzhu frowned: "How do you have the nerve to ask?"

Liang Shi: "?"

"Teacher Liang." Xu Qingzhu questioned her: "Tell me the truth—did you abuse me after I got drunk?"

Liang Shi: "....."

"You really don't remember anything?" Liang Shi asked.

Xu Qingzhu didn't respond, just stared at her unblinkingly.

Before Liang Shi could say anything, Xu Qingzhu suddenly reached out and poked near her mouth: "What happened to your mouth? Why is the corner of your lip split?"

Liang Shi: "....."
