

Chapter 185 Part 1: Extra Story 8-1

Mumu did go to school and apologize to that child.

The other parent also listened to their own child's wishes and continued letting the child sit with Mumu as desk mates.

Meanwhile, Chaochao was arranged to sit at the other end of the classroom, almost diagonally opposite.

Chaochao and Mumu were separated at kindergarten—they didn't even sit together during lunch.

Usually, Mumu would always say she hated her sister, but after being separated for one day, as soon as school let out, she would hold onto Chaochao's hand tightly and not let go.

It was the height of summer, the weather so hot that people wished they could dive into a refrigerator and roll around. Yet Mumu insisted on holding onto Chaochao with her sweaty, clammy hands. Chaochao struggled several times to no avail.

Once they got in the car with air conditioning, Chaochao immediately found wet wipes to clean her hands.

That day, Xu Qingzhu came to pick them up. Liang Shi had an interview and didn't have time to come.

Actually, they should have asked the housekeeper to come, but Xu Qingzhu liked to personally handle matters concerning these two children. Since kindergarten let out early, Xu Qingzhu would pick them up and go to the company first, letting them sit in the office to do homework or draw. She and Liang Shi were also planning to send them to interest classes they liked once the two little ones were a bit older.

Xu Qingzhu saw Chaochao wiping her hands with a frown and asked her what was wrong.

Chaochao looked up, "Mommy, little sister is clingy."

Mumu: ".....Hmph, mean sister."

Xu Qingzhu laughed at this and didn't bother with them anymore, letting them bicker in the back seat.

The two little ones bickering was also quite funny, though Chaochao wasn't good with words and always ended up at a disadvantage.

Mumu—who knew who she took after—always had so much to say when arguing, and spoke quickly too. Chaochao was no match for her at all.

Chaochao wasn't good at arguing and would only sulk in silence.

After the bickering ended, having lost, she sat in the corner of the car and ignored Mumu.

Mumu then went to coax her in that irksome way of hers, "Jiejie~"

Chaochao lowered her head to read a book.

By the time Xu Qingzhu brought them to the company, Mumu still hadn't successfully coaxed Chaochao.

Chaochao stood there very coolly, while Mumu followed behind her like a little tail.

It wasn't until they entered the office that Mumu flopped onto the sofa and said tiredly: "Jiejie, you're so hard to coax."

Chaochao said quietly: "I didn't ask you to coax me."

Mumu: "....."

So Mumu really stopped trying to coax her.

By dinnertime, Chaochao was still ignoring her.

Mumu put her favorite beef into Chaochao's bowl. Chaochao pushed it aside and lowered her head to eat.

Mumu pouted aggrievedly and looked toward Liang Shi.

Liang Shi had long known what happened between them on the way, so she pretended not to see Mumu's distress signal.

Xu Qingzhu did the same.

Left without any support, Mumu lowered her head and picked at her rice, finding it as tasteless as wax.

Before bed, Mumu lay unhappily on the bed, not even close to Chaochao.

The little sister who wasn't clinging to Chaochao seemed especially well-behaved, but also especially dejected.

Both Liang Shi and Xu Qingzhu wanted to see how the two of them would handle their sisterly issues, so neither intervened this time.

In the past when things like this occasionally happened, Xu Qingzhu or Liang Shi would subconsciously ask the sensible Chaochao to yield to her little sister, not to argue with her or to forgive first.

But they were already kindergarteners now. Xu Qingzhu and Liang Shi had both realized that always making Chaochao yield to Mumu would make Chaochao's personality become more and more withdrawn. So they didn't interfere in conflicts between the two, wanting to see how Chaochao would handle it.

It was also because Liang Shi had coincidentally run into Zhou Li, who had returned to visit family, and she said that Rainbow had been withdrawn as a child because she had been too strict.

So she advised Liang Shi not to be too strict with children.

Especially in a twin family like this—even though one was called the older sister, she had only come into this world a few seconds before her younger sister. It wasn't fair for either one to always yield to the other.

Smart children were especially sensitive to these things.

After discussing with Xu Qingzhu, they both felt they should proactively talk to Chaochao, hoping she could be happy.

Both of them were first-time mothers and didn't know what was best.

The biggest problem with raising children was that you had to feel your way across the river the whole time.¹ There was never a perfect textbook, nor a perfect template.

That night before bed, Xu Qingzhu secretly went to the two children's room. She had originally intended to go in and see if they were asleep, but then she heard Chaochao say slowly: "I don't hate you."

Mumu choked out: "You keep ignoring me~"

Chaochao said in a muffled voice: "Don't argue with me in the future. I can't win against you."

Mumu: "Okay~"

Chaochao: "Alright, let's sleep."

Mumu: "I want to hold hands~"

Chaochao: "Childish."

Mumu: ".....Jiejie."

Chaochao must have reached her hand over, "Scaredy-cat."

Mumu didn't argue back, changing from crying to laughing: "Jiejie is the best."

Xu Qingzhu returned to the room satisfied, lying there discussing with Liang Shi about who Mumu's mischievously clever nature took after.

After discussing back and forth, they both felt it might be like their little aunt, that little demon king Sheng Yu.

However, the little demon king was only ten years old now.

Even in elementary school, she was still that fiery little demon king.

But Liang Shi smiled: "She might also take after me."

Xu Qingzhu: "?"

Did she have some misunderstanding about Liang Shi?

Liang Shi winked at her, suddenly raised her hand, and mimicking Mumu's usual manner, waved it down, "Meow~"

Xu Qingzhu: "....."

Xu Qingzhu's smile suddenly grew wider. She leaned forward and fell into her arms, laughing until she was shaking uncontrollably.
