

Chapter 25-6

//

The next morning.

Sunlight poured into the room, spreading across the bed, somewhat glaring. Liang Shi was awakened by the brightness.

She picked up her phone to check the time - 8:20.

It was time to get up, but Xu Qingzhu was still sleeping, as if trying to make up for all the sleep she hadn't gotten before.

Liang Shi was afraid the sunlight would disturb her, so she got up and pulled the curtains tighter.

The room immediately fell back into dimness.

Liang Shi had always maintained good sleep habits.

When not filming, she would get up around eight in the morning, exercise for a while, eat breakfast, then watch shows or read books. In the afternoon, she would sit on the balcony drinking afternoon tea, spending a relaxed and pleasant day.

When she got up, there was no one else at home. The common areas had already been cleaned by the servants, spotless.

She went to the kitchen to pour herself a glass of water, then took bread from the refrigerator and cracked an egg into the breakfast machine.

She planned to make sandwiches.

If conditions allowed, she would definitely eat breakfast.

Just as she was busy in the kitchen, Xu Qingya's voice suddenly rang out: "Sister Liang, you can cook too?"

Liang Shi's fried egg was just perfectly medium, still with a runny yolk. She stole a moment from her busyness to look back, only to see Xu Qingya with messy hair, not caring about her appearance at all. She yawned widely and reached for the bread, taking a bite before Liang Shi could say anything.

"That's cold," Liang Shi said.

Unfortunately, she said it a step too late.

Xu Qingya didn't mind though, "It's fine, as long as it's edible."

Liang Shi: "..."

Alright then.

"Where's my sister?" Xu Qingya asked, "Not awake yet?"

"Mm." Liang Shi said: "The doctor said last night that she might sleep for a day and night."

Xu Qingya shook her head, "She's really become Sleeping Beauty."

She bit into the piece of bread while playing on her phone. After a while, she looked up and asked: "Sister Liang, what are you making? Make me one too, I'm a bit hungry."

Liang Shi answered without looking back: "Sandwich, it'll be ready soon."

As she spoke, she had already wrapped one up and handed it to Xu Qingya, then started making her own portion.

Xu Qingya took a bite, originally not expecting much from Liang Shi's cooking skills. After all, sandwiches were like scrambled eggs with tomatoes - it was nearly impossible to make them taste terrible, but making them taste really good wasn't very likely either.

But as soon as this entered her mouth, Xu Qingya was shocked.

At first she wasn't sure, thinking maybe she was just too hungry, so she was having the illusion that this thing was fresh and delicious.

But she quickly took two more bites, and only after swallowing everything did she say: "Sister Liang, did you really make this?"

Liang Shi laughed helplessly, "You were sitting here the whole time, how could I cheat?"

"No, this is too delicious." Xu Qingya gave her a thumbs up, "This cooking skill can rival a five-star chef. What did you use? Why does it taste so fresh? So fresh I want to bite off my own tongue."

Liang Shi felt her praise was too exaggerated.

Liang Shi was somewhat confident about her cooking skills - after all, she had worked in kitchens for many years - but suddenly facing such high praise, it seemed she couldn't accept it.

"Just ordinary method," Liang Shi said: "Fried egg, lettuce, cheese, tomato, and a little sauce."

"Better than anything I've eaten before." Xu Qingya praised sincerely, "This makes me want to live at your house permanently."

Liang Shi: "..."

Please don't.

But she couldn't say that honestly, so she put on a kind appearance: "You can stay, as long as you want."

After a pause, she added a condition: "As long as your sister lets you stay."

Xu Qingya: "Tsk."

Liang Shi quickly finished making her own sandwich and sat there chatting casually with Xu Qingya.

Mainly Xu Qingya was chatting with her, and she was responsible for responding.

Xu Qingya was quite a talkative little girl. When discussing idol culture, her eyes would light up.

She also said her dream was to become an agent.

But after saying that, she was somewhat silent, pausing before saying: "Forget it, I should change my dream."

"Why?" Liang Shi was puzzled.

Xu Qingya sighed, "Sister Weiwei is an agent. A lot of Chen Zhengxuan's merchandise was gotten for me by her."

Liang Shi also understood her concerns, but could only offer lukewarm comfort: "Not all agents are like that."

But it did remind her of Bai Weiwei and Zhao Xuning.

After she left with Xu Qingzhu last night, she didn't see Zhao Xuning on the road, so she still didn't know how things went on Zhao Xuning's side.

Out of humanitarian spirit, after Liang Shi finished breakfast and put the dishes in the dishwasher, she sent Zhao Xuning a message asking about her situation.

After a long while, Zhao Xuning replied: [Not bad.]

Quite a perfunctory answer.

But Liang Shi had done her part.

After that, she didn't bother anymore.

In the morning, having nothing else to do, she began researching information about Dongheng Group, especially about the newly established magazine department.

Just as Liang Xinhe had said, this magazine department was a newly established division that hadn't even published a single issue yet. They only had an official Weibo account that hadn't posted anything, with ten thousand followers - probably bought followers.

Since they hadn't published anything, there was pitifully little information available online.

She then looked at other electronic publications, especially seeking experiences from companies similar to Dongheng Group that had started electronic magazines, trying to find some successful experiences.

During her research, she discovered that the first in the industry to do this was Haiwei Jewelry.

Clearly just a jewelry company, but they had advanced experience - not only creating electronic magazines but also establishing a first-class domestic fashion magazine - "Mingzhu" (Pearl).

In this era when print media had declined and the print media industry had become a sunset industry, with many major magazine companies shutting down one after another, and the remaining ones mostly operating at a loss or persisting with passion, "Mingzhu" had carved out a different path, focusing heavily on feminism and inviting renowned domestic writers to write editorials.

In a fashion magazine, there wasn't much written content, but every article in each issue was penetrating.

In the new media era, it could be said they achieved 100k+ readership in minutes.

But their magazine and electronic publication were done separately, with completely non-overlapping content.

Precisely because of this, the electronic publication didn't steal sales from the magazine.

The group of people running this magazine had never been in the magazine industry before - there were people from the fashion industry, designers, and even web novel writers.

So the industry's evaluation of "Mingzhu" magazine was: a group of third-rate people created a first-rate magazine.
