

Chapter 27-11

//

On her first day at work, she had caused a storm in the company. Before work was even over, every department knew that a new employee had been airborne into the magazine department and directly fired the usually volatile Editor-in-Chief Sun.

This left a vacancy in the magazine department's management.

Currently, everyone was speculating whether the new employee would be directly promoted to department head.

But there was no confirmed news yet.

Liang Xinhe held meetings very efficiently. He concisely finalized the first issue's topic selection for the magazine—deciding on the one Liang Shi had previously suggested: "Everyone can own one BARE in their lifetime."

After finalizing the topic, he assigned tasks to each team leader, but didn't mention the new department head position, telling each team to come directly to him if they had any issues.

Liang Shi didn't work overtime on her first day. After work, she drove home.

On the road, she received a call from Zhao Xuning, saying Bai Weiwei had woken up and visits could be arranged. She had already sent the room number via text message.

Liang Shi acknowledged this and turned around to drive to Xu Qingzhu's company, calling her along the way.

But no one answered.

After reaching the building of her company, Liang Shi called her again. Still no answer.

"..."

Seriously?

This was supposed to be staying in contact at all times?

Were they supposed to communicate by carrier pigeon¹?

Liang Shi sighed helplessly and had to enter the company.

The receptionist was new and didn't recognize her. When she said she was looking for Xu Qingzhu, the receptionist asked if she had an appointment. She shook her head, then confidently countered, "Do I need an appointment to see my own wife?"

Though she was fake, her identity was real.

While feeling guilty saying this, she also pretended to be confident, not letting anyone see through her.

The receptionist immediately called Xu Qingzhu's office. No one answered.

Receptionist: "..."

She was afraid the person might be lying, but also afraid she wasn't.

After all, this was the young lady's wife. As a working person, she couldn't afford to offend anyone.

After much consideration, she tentatively asked, "How about I take you upstairs to have a look?"

Liang Shi nodded, "Okay, thank you for the trouble."

The design department was on the tenth floor. When Liang Shi and the receptionist stood in the elevator, the receptionist couldn't help stealing glances at her, worried about making a mistake. But she also felt that such a premium Alpha, whether in temperament or appearance, matched well with their young lady. Surely it couldn't be fake?

But this was just her speculation.

She nervously led Liang Shi upstairs, only to find the design department workstations were all empty.

However, the lights were on in the large conference room. Through the frosted glass, they could see it was packed with people, apparently all in a meeting. She asked Liang Shi to wait a moment.

This wait lasted an hour.

Liang Shi: "..."

She seemed to understand why Xu Qingzhu could bring Minghui Jewelry back from the brink and eventually take it public.

The slackers had already left work, while the diligent were still in meetings.

The meeting lasted until nearly eight o'clock.

Employees came out of the office carrying file folders, looking like wilted eggplants², but each department was fulfilling their duties with fairly coordinated cooperation.

It seemed tonight would be another sleepless night for them.

Liang Shi roughly counted the number of people and ordered late-night snacks for everyone.

Footnotes:

1. 飛鴿傳書 (fēi gē chuán shū) - "Carrier pigeon messaging" - A traditional Chinese method of long-distance communication using trained pigeons. Here it's used sarcastically to express frustration about the lack of modern communication.
2. 霜打了的茄子 (shuāng dǎ le de qié zi) - "Eggplants hit by frost" - A Chinese idiom describing people who look wilted, dejected, or exhausted, like vegetables that have been damaged by cold weather.