

Chapter 46-7

//

The archery rules were that both parties would wear helmets with apples placed on top.

They would see whose aim was more accurate, who could shoot the apple.

The face-covering part of the helmet was transparent.

This method had a very high difficulty level.

It was a game the original owner and Cheng Ran used to play when they fooled around together to torment people.

Although the person being tormented knew the arrow wouldn't actually hit their face, they were still afraid - what if it hit their body?

Liang Shi chose their former shared entertainment activity to end this game.

She brought Rainbow along too, but just had her wait in the car.

Then she would fight a quick battle.

Archery was Cheng Ran's specialty. She had already won the silver medal in the Haizhou City youth archery competition in middle school.

The original owner, as a spoiled waste who couldn't do anything, knew nothing.

But Liang Shi had previously filmed period dramas and played a female general.

Other actors might use stunt doubles, but Liang Shi had earnestly learned archery for three months.

She had trained her arm strength to the extreme - modern bows, ancient bows, she could hit the bullseye every time.

On the vast, boundless grassland, streetlights lit up one after another.

The sky was covered with a layer of deep blue, and in the night curtain were bits of starlight.

To end things quickly, Liang Shi chose a single round to determine the winner.

Cheng Ran even gave her a chance to back out, mocking her naivety.

Had she really lost her memory and thought she could do anything now?

She had even forgotten what her best friend used to be best at.

But Liang Shi told her to fight quickly and decisively.

The moment the helmet was put on, Liang Shi's gaze became sharp, like an unsheathed sword.

She and Cheng Ran looked directly into each other's eyes.

Liang Shi asked her, "Do you keep your word?"

Cheng Ran scoffed lightly, "I'm not so low as to break promises with you."

Liang Shi curved her lips in a smile, "Then that's fine."

Between casual conversation and laughter, the arrow had already left her hand. The arrow that swiftly left the bowstring pierced through the wind.

At the same time, the arrow in Cheng Ran's hand also departed.

Two arrows converged in mid-air.

Neither of them moved, standing straight in place.

But when the arrow pierced through the wind and was only a step away from her, Cheng Ran couldn't help but fearfully step back half a pace, her head also slightly shifting.

Then came a "thud" sound.

The sharp arrow pierced through the apple on her helmet.

Meanwhile, her arrow barely grazed past Liang Shi's right side. After encountering resistance, it slowed down and finally fell to the ground.

Liang Shi removed her helmet and said confidently and generously, "You lost."

Cheng Ran asked in disbelief, "Why? You actually didn't dodge? You used to dodge every time before."

Liang Shi smiled slightly, "A gentleman's wager, a gentleman's agreement."

She looked at Cheng Ran and repeated, "You lost."

Cheng Ran closed her eyes, her expression complex.

She never would have thought that she would lose in her most prideful skill, and lose to Liang Shi of all people.

But this was the event she had chosen herself, the venue she had picked herself.

She had also calculated based on Liang Shi's weakness.

But she hadn't expected that Liang Shi wouldn't even blink, neither avoiding nor yielding.

Cheng Ran clenched her fists, then relaxed them.

"A bet is a bet," Cheng Ran said.

Liang Shi placed her helmet on the ground, "I hope to see your sincere apology."
