

Chapter 55-4

//

Liang Shi didn't dare delay. After parting ways with Zhao Xuning, she immediately contacted the psychologist Gina.

Gina was shocked when she received her call, but still arranged a meeting time with her.

It was a rest day, so Gina wasn't at the hospital.

After inquiring about the address, they discovered they weren't far from each other, so Gina directly invited Liang Shi to her home.

Gina's home was on the top floor of a high-end residential complex, on the 32nd floor accessible by elevator.

When Liang Shi entered, she was greeted by a white Pomeranian. The dog had originally been excitedly welcoming the guest, but upon seeing her, its face immediately drooped, fear showing in its eyes as it wagged its tail and ran away. The sound of the bell around its neck echoed throughout the house.

Standing at the door, Gina noticed her puzzled expression and said, "She probably still has trauma from you."

Liang Shi: "..."

Did the original owner also harm small animals?

Gina was a very tall woman with brown curly long hair, single eyelids, no makeup, and yellow skin. She gave off a very comfortable feeling.

Only she and the Pomeranian lived in the house. The little dog quietly nestled in a corner, as if it didn't exist.

Gina led Liang Shi into the study.

Her study had a very special layout.

Liang Shi had previously acted in dramas about psychological counselors, so she had some knowledge about counseling rooms.

This study was a very typical psychological counseling room—the wall clock, the placement of the sofas, the green plants on the windowsill, and the small decorative items on her desk.

Upon entering, it would give those in the know a sense of psychological pressure.

Although the room was brightly lit and looked refreshing at first glance.

"Please sit," Gina said, taking out a manila envelope from her drawer. "I heard you lost your memory?"

Liang Shi coughed lightly: "I remember some parts, but I don't remember you."

"Should we continue our psychological therapy?" Gina asked. "Or would you prefer to register anew at our hospital?"

"No need," Liang Shi said. "I don't have any major psychological problems now. I just want to understand my previous situation."

"If you're better now, I wouldn't recommend you learning about the past," Gina paused and said. "By whatever means, you've already healed yourself. Learning about the past might trigger painful memories and return you to your previous state."

"But a person without a past is incomplete," Liang Shi said. "I still hope to understand."

Gina stared at her for a while, then handed her the therapy files.

As Liang Shi was opening the envelope, Gina continued, "You became my patient when you were 18 years old. There were only five sessions over two months. Later, you forcibly withdrew from therapy, and I went abroad. I remember you very clearly because of your defensive mechanisms."

Gina couldn't help but sigh at this point, "I'm very curious about what you've experienced in all these years."

Halfway through reading the files, Liang Shi looked up and smiled—a very kind smile. "Perhaps I experienced love."

"..."

Gina paused. "Love is indeed the cure for everything."

When Liang Shi left Gina's house with the original owner's psychological therapy records from when she was 18, her mood was somewhat heavy, but she still said goodbye to Gina warmly.

However, Gina said, "Next time, we can chat about what happened to you these years."

Liang Shi smiled. "Sure."

After leaving Gina's house, she drove home.

On the road, she kept her speed very slow, her mind weighed down with concerns, afraid she might cause an accident if she drove too fast.
