

Chapter 82-4

Liang Xinzhou nodded: "I raised her, after all. When she was little, she was such a tiny thing. When she first learned to walk, she would toddle unsteadily, insisting on chasing after you. After she learned to walk properly, she would act cute and ask to be carried. When she saw sweat on your forehead, she would lift her sleeve to wipe it for you. After wiping, she would specifically say she wanted to get down and walk, because she felt bad that gege was tired."

Yu Wan looked at him. "Aren't you afraid I'll get jealous when you talk like that? She has no blood relation to you now."

"She's still my little sister." Liang Xinzhou smiled as he said this.

A very natural smile, genuine happiness from the heart. "So when I look at her now, it's like the her from when she was little has come back."

"Indeed." Yu Wan said. "When I first married into your family, I thought Liang Shi was the most annoying one. But if you really asked me what was annoying about her, it wasn't that bad—she was just lifeless, always with a gloomy face. Now she's... very sunny, and comfortable to be around. When I watch her play with Ling Dang, I even feel like joining in."

Liang Xinzhou held her hand. "Then let's go for a walk in the park this afternoon and use little sister's money to buy you some hot milk."

Yu Wan laughed softly. "Alright, Mr. Liang."

In this moment, Liang Xinzhou was just her husband, the father of the baby in her belly.

Not President Liang of Dongheng Group, not needing to worry about so many complicated matters.

//

Liang Shi simply felt it was unfair for Liang Xinzhou. After sending that message, she felt much better inside.

In the afternoon, she handed over her work to her colleagues. She didn't have much on hand, so the handover was completed quickly.

After finishing, she just sat there waiting for everyone to get off work, playing with her phone out of boredom.

While scrolling through Weibo, she discovered a hashtag called #Qingyi University Woman in Red#.

Liang Shi: ".....?"

She clicked in with curiosity, then clicked out with embarrassment.

The hashtag was created by a marketing account, and the content following it read: This morning, a woman in red appeared on the field at Qingyi University. Her outstanding appearance attracted many onlookers. Many people asked for her contact information on the confession wall¹, but discovered she wasn't from Qingyi University. So a campaign was launched across the internet to find the #Qingyi University Woman in Red#, to see if netizens have the ability to do so.

Below were nine photos in a grid.

They were all candid shots taken by students.

Because the autumn wind was strong, the hem of the red dress was blown up by the wind—no need for a hair dryer.

The casual candid shots were all incredibly beautiful.

The comments below were all unanimous praise.

[I was lucky enough to see this jiejie² up close in the restroom. I can only say, she's really beautiful.]

[Not to the level of toppling nations and cities³, but enough to strike my heart.]

[These netizens are slacking—haven't found jiejie's Weibo yet?]

[I'm setting up camp in the comments section. As a face-con⁴, I've already fallen into jiejie's sea of love.]

[Starting today, I'm a fish in jiejie's pond. This is too bewitching—who could resist?]

[.....]

As it happened, Zhao Ling also saw the trending topic and asked her if she needed to make a clarification. After all, she was going to enter the entertainment industry, and mentioning her would help her gain a wave of followers.

Liang Shi sent over her Weibo account, which was just her name.

Zhao Ling immediately followed her.

But just as Zhao Ling was about to clarify, some resourceful netizens had already traced it back to Liang Shi.

[Friends, case solved! It's the third female lead jiejie from Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo "Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo Mo"!]

[Go look at the costume photos. Today, whose tears uncontrollably flowed down from the corner of their mouth? It's me.]

[I went to look. That red dress is still the most beautiful! I'm writing a blood petition⁵ begging the director to arrange scenes with the beauty wearing a red dress.]

[Seconding the above, 10086⁶.]

[.....]

Liang Shi's Weibo followers started growing at an extremely fast rate—to the point where her phone started lagging.

Every refresh added several hundred followers, every refresh added several hundred private messages. Red notification dots were everywhere—enough to drive someone with mild OCD crazy.

But it was also a sweet burden.

Taking advantage of this wave of popularity, Liang Shi posted a Weibo for work purposes, with photos of herself wearing JK⁷ and wearing the red dress.

Two photos total, with a very strong contrast.

@Liang Shi: Does this count as being able to pull off both cool and sweet? /picture/picture

The comments section was rapidly occupied by face-cons.

[How could it not count?!]

[Wuwuwu, can I really see this for free?]

[Jiejie, I have a friend who wants you to show that section of your waistline.]

[The person above, please put some clothes on!]

[.....]

Many people came to get close to the beauty, and the comment section's atmosphere completely changed.

Liang Shi's Weibo follower count surged—in less than half an hour, she already had over ten thousand followers.

Liang Shi secretly took a peek at Xu Qingzhu's Weibo and found that Xu Qingzhu had over 700,000 followers.

Ah... there really are so many face-cons in this world.

Liang Shi wasn't someone who was very addicted to social media, so after posting a Weibo and scanning through the comments section, she exited the app.

She read the script on her computer for a while. When it was almost five o'clock, Zhou Li and the others had a meeting.

Liang Shi glanced at the time and quietly asked Zhou Li: "Do you need me to pick up Rainbow for you?"

Zhou Li: "....."

She paused for a moment. "If you're not busy."

"I'm not busy." Liang Shi said. "After I pick her up, I'll take her directly to the place where we're having dinner tonight."

Zhou Li nodded: "Okay, thank you. I'll send you the restaurant address later. We'll try to finish up here as early as possible."

Liang Shi: "Sure thing."

After packing up everything at her workstation, looking at the empty space, Liang Shi felt a bit reluctant to leave.

She carried her cardboard box downstairs and encountered some familiar faces on the way. Although she couldn't recall their names, she knew which department they were from.

Before she knew it, she had already spent nearly a month with everyone.

But no matter how reluctant she was, she had to say goodbye.

This was the first place where Liang Shi was recognized after she arrived.

Footnotes:

¹ Confession wall (表白牆): A popular feature on Chinese university social media platforms or bulletin boards where students can anonymously post confessions of love, search for people they've seen on campus, or share messages. It's similar to a "missed connections" board.

² Jiejie (姐姐): Chinese term for "older sister," but commonly used as a respectful and affectionate way to address an older woman or a woman one admires.

³ "Toppling nations and cities" (傾國傾城): A classical Chinese idiom used to describe someone of extraordinary beauty—so beautiful that they could cause the downfall of nations and cities. It originates from ancient Chinese literature.

⁴ Face-con (顏狗): Literally "face dog," Chinese internet slang for someone who is attracted to or appreciates beautiful faces; a person who judges or likes others based on their appearance. Similar to the term "visual stan."

⁵ Blood petition (血書): A dramatic way of expressing extreme sincerity or desperation in a request, referencing the historical practice of writing petitions in one's own blood to show devotion. Used humorously online to express strong wishes.

⁶ 10086: The customer service number for China Mobile. Used as internet slang to mean "I strongly agree" or "I support this," as if saying "I'll call customer service to complain if this doesn't happen."

⁷ JK: Short for "Joshi Kosei" (女子高生), meaning Japanese high school girl. In this context, it refers to Japanese high school girl-style uniforms, which have become a popular fashion subculture in China.