

Chapter 100

With a "ding" sound, the door opened from inside, and a doctor in a white coat walked out.

Under Yin Lingzhu's expectant gaze, the doctor spoke.

"We did our best."

Hearing the doctor say this, Yin Lingzhu's face turned pale.

"From here on, it depends on the patient's own will to survive."

Hearing the doctor say this, Yin Lingzhu's face suddenly became even paler.

Did this mean that Yan Si might not be able to survive?

The doctor consolingly patted Yin Lingzhu's shoulder.

He had seen this kind of situation many times before.

But Yin Lingzhu had no reaction to the doctor's comforting gesture.

She stared blankly at the operating room.

Watching as Yan Si was wheeled out, watching as the doctors busily arranged a room for Yan Si.

Yin Lingzhu suddenly felt lost.

If Yan Si was no longer in this world, what would be the meaning of her existence?

Yin Lingzhu sat powerlessly in the chair, looking at the unconscious Yan Si.

At this moment, Yan Si's breathing was so faint it was barely visible.

Looking at her, Yin Lingzhu desperately hoped in her heart that this scene was fake.

But the smell of disinfectant at the tip of her nose clearly reminded her that this had really happened.

Yin Lingzhu rested her head on Yan Si's hand, and suddenly realized how thin Yan Si had become.

She could clearly feel the bones on the back of Yan Si's hand.

Yin Lingzhu's heart suddenly ached, and the tears she had been holding back could no longer be hidden.

Uncontrollable sobs emerged from her throat.

Starting softly, then growing louder and louder.

At this moment, Yin Lingzhu couldn't control her emotions.

The tears seemed destined to lose control from the moment they began to flow.

Yin Lingzhu didn't know when her emotions had calmed down.

She only remembered that the sky was particularly dark that day.

Looking out from the hospital room, nothing could be seen clearly.

It was pitch black, frightening from the heart.

Yin Lingzhu stayed by Yan Si's side the whole time.

She didn't know if Yan Si would wake up. According to the doctor, Yan Si would most likely become a vegetative patient¹.

Yin Lingzhu had made up her mind—she would stay by Yan Si's side until Yan Si woke up.

Even if Yan Si never woke up in this lifetime, she would be willing to accompany her.

"Miss Yin, this is President Yan's will that she made previously."

Yan Si's secretary handed the document to Yin Lingzhu.

Yin Lingzhu looked at that piece of paper with vacant eyes. When she saw "transferring ninety percent of assets under my name to Yin Lingzhu," her eyes suddenly became panicked.

Did this will mean that Yan Si had not wanted to live long ago?

This also meant that when Yan Si said she wanted to die, she wasn't lying to her.

Yin Lingzhu gripped the will in her hand tightly, emotions surging violently.

She looked at the person lying on the hospital bed with reddened eyes, gritting her teeth.

"Do you think that by doing this, I'll forgive you?"

Her voice was fierce.

"Impossible!"

Yin Lingzhu threw the will to the ground, the friction between paper and floor making a particularly loud sound.

The air instantly froze.

The assistant, seeing this situation, realized things weren't as she had imagined.

She picked up the will from the ground and quietly left the hospital room.

Yin Lingzhu grasped Yan Si's hand. "Please, wake up. Don't make me hate you."

Many scenes flashed through her mind instantly.

Admittedly, their past didn't seem so enviable.

But as long as the person was still alive, there was opportunity for everything.

All the beautiful things, they could experience together.

"I forgive you. Please wake up, okay?"

But the person she thought about day and night couldn't give her any response at this moment.

If it weren't for careful observation showing the rise and fall of Yan Si's chest, she would really doubt whether Yan Si was still alive.

Just when Yin Lingzhu had lost hope and was about to put down Yan Si's hand, she suddenly noticed Yan Si's hand move slightly.

Just as Yin Lingzhu was wondering if this was her hallucination, Yan Si's index finger moved again.

Yin Lingzhu quickly found the attending physician.

After another examination by the doctor, she learned something that made Yin Lingzhu happy.

Yan Si could now respond to external stimuli.

"You should talk to her more in the future. It's very helpful for the patient's recovery."

After listening, Yin Lingzhu nodded seriously and made a series of plans in her heart.

When she returned to the hospital room and wanted to check on Yan Si, something unexpected happened.

She saw Yan Si with her eyes open, leaning against the wall, smiling at her.

This scene was what she had been thinking about during this time, yet didn't dare hope for.

Yin Lingzhu stood frozen in place, her brain unable to process it.

Yan Si had just woken up, her lips completely colorless, but this didn't diminish the happy atmosphere surrounding her.

"I heard everything."

Yin Lingzhu was startled, not understanding what Yan Si meant by this.

Yan Si turned toward her, her eyes seemingly containing stars and seas.

"I heard it—you said you forgave me."

Yin Lingzhu seemed to see Yan Si's tail wagging happily behind her as she spoke.

She smiled.

"That depends on your future behavior, Mrs. Yin."

Footnotes:

¹ Vegetative patient: A person in a persistent vegetative state, a condition where a patient is awake but shows no signs of awareness.