

Chapter 33-2

In the hotel lobby, Yin Lingzhu hesitated for a moment.

When President Yan asked her which room they should go to, she chose President Yan's room.

The hotel that the director had arranged for the crew would have room service and housekeeping.

Yin Lingzhu had declined all these services.

She had always valued her private space very much, even when staying in a hotel.

She didn't want outsiders to see her room.

And President Yan, to her, was also an outsider.

President Yan was stunned when she heard her choice, "I thought you wouldn't be willing to come to my room."

Yin Lingzhu smiled, "President Yan, you're overthinking. To be able to receive your guidance, I'm very honored."

The distance between Yin Lingzhu and President Yan was more than a meter, and Yin Lingzhu was currently crossing her arms—this was a defensive posture.

President Yan looked at her movements and realized that "President Yan" was an even more distant form of address than "Yan Si."

Perhaps because she hadn't drunk water all morning, her throat felt somewhat dry, and even swallowing saliva felt difficult.

She wanted to tell Yin Lingzhu not to call her that, not to call her President Yan, but she found that she couldn't open her mouth.

It seemed as if there was a mass of pressure stuck in her chest cavity, unable to go up or down, bringing an impossible-to-ignore feeling that lay across her chest.

President Yan's mouth opened and closed, and finally she forced herself to produce a smile.

Silence spread between the two of them.

President Yan's room was arranged very neatly, even appearing cold and empty, completely unable to tell that there was still someone living there.

President Yan took out her script and placed it on the table.

"This is my script. I've marked some emotional changes on it. You can take a look."

Yin Lingzhu looked in the direction of the voice and saw President Yan's script.

President Yan had written many words on it with a black pen, densely covering the entire page.

Yin Lingzhu felt a bit surprised in her heart. She responded with a "good" and walked over to pick up the script.

President Yan's handwriting was very beautiful—elegant and upright, with sharp strokes. Although she had only used black pen for annotations, it didn't look messy.

Yin Lingzhu couldn't help but admire it, like a poor student looking at an honor student's notes.

Although President Yan was pouring water, her peripheral vision was always on Yin Lingzhu.

Observing Yin Lingzhu's expression, President Yan couldn't help but straighten her spine.

But since she was currently bending over to get water, when she moved, the water cup tilted, and the hot water coming from the water dispenser spilled onto the back of her hand.

"Ah." President Yan let out a small cry of surprise.

Footnotes:

¹ President Yan (宴總): This is how Yin Lingzhu formally addresses Yan Si in her professional capacity as a company president/executive. It maintains professional distance and shows respect for her status, but also creates emotional distance between them.

² Water dispenser: In Chinese offices and hotels, it's common to have electric water dispensers that provide both hot and cold water on demand.

³ Honor student's notes: Refers to the common phenomenon where academically struggling students admire the organized, detailed notes of top-performing students. This metaphor emphasizes the gap Yin Lingzhu perceives between her acting abilities and President Yan's expertise.