

Chapter 105-2 - My Love

Ning Fuyi had always felt that a long lifespan was also a burden. Days passed slowly with the turning of stars and seasons, and after living long enough, everything looked tasteless and dull.

But after this journey through the mortal world, she learned how precious time was, like wind blowing through one's palm - even with her vast divine powers, she couldn't keep half of it.

On the second day after returning from Gunan County to the foot of the mountain, Su Mo began to wither like a flower with broken roots, visibly deteriorating.

At first she was just physically weak, but eventually she could barely walk. Each day she lay in bed smiling, showing no signs of sorrow.

As late summer ended, the emerald fields were tinged with gold. The mountains were mixed with red and yellow. Wild geese often flocked to the riverside, flying south the next day, leaving only their calls echoing behind.

Later, the autumn colors faded. Frost covered the ground everywhere, and withered grass silently drooped their heads. Heaven and earth were veiled in gray.

Su Mo had even less strength to smile. She slept most of each day, and when occasionally awake, she would hold Ning Fuyi's hand without speaking, as if she could never see enough of her.

This morning, ice pellets like snow fell from the sky, pattering against the windows. Ning Fuyi was awakened by the sound and got up to put on clothes.

In her drowsiness, it was already the first snow. Ning Fuyi stared blankly at the whitening mountains and rivers, closing the window tightly.

But when she turned back, she met bright eyes.

Su Mo had awakened at some point and was looking at her clearly and lucidly.

"It's still early. Won't you sleep more? Are you cold?" Ning Fuyi spoke while going to get cotton quilts, but was stopped by Su Mo's outstretched hand.

"I'm not cold, I'm even a bit warm." Su Mo smiled lightly, looking toward the window. "Is it, snowing?"

Ning Fuyi nodded.

"I want, to go out, and see." Su Mo struggled to extend her hand from under the bedding. "Will you hold me, please?"

Ning Fuyi would never refuse her. She immediately brought a cloak, wrapped Su Mo tightly in it, then lifted her horizontally and kicked open the door to walk into the cold wind.

The bitter wind hurt their faces, but Su Mo didn't mind at all. She looked up at the gray sky, feeling the ice pellets hitting her face.

"Stay with me, sit a while. I want, to watch the snow." Su Mo said.

Her cheeks hadn't been this red in a long time, making her look like she had regained some vitality.

Ning Fuyi quickly dragged over a reclining chair and placed it in the courtyard. Opening the courtyard gate, she sat on it holding Su Mo, letting her lie completely in her arms.

The location of her house was excellent. Just by keeping the courtyard gate open, they could see distant mountains, rivers, fields, and the lonely bamboo house on the slope below.

The snow had grown heavier, no longer hard ice pellets but drifting goose feathers, falling in large flakes.

When they landed on Su Mo's lips, she playfully extended her tongue tip to draw them into her mouth.

"Yiyi, the pills I made some days ago - though you're not mortal, they clear the heart and calm the spirit, which can't hurt." Su Mo gestured with her pale hands.

"I've saved up the remaining debt money and hidden it in the bamboo house cabinet. You must help me repay it to the Qin family."

"I want to wear the white clothes my parents left behind. They're both buried under that mountain. Remember to bury me there too."

...

Gradually Su Mo could no longer lift her hands. She leaned against Ning Fuyi in a daze, watching the white snow.

Behind her, where she couldn't see, Ning Fuyi was already biting her hand and crying silently. Her whole body trembled uncontrollably, unable to suppress her sobs.

"Yiyi... on the tombstone, could you, help me, carve words?"

Su Mo's voice was already barely audible, like sleep-talk just before falling asleep.

"Just write, My beloved... Su Mo."

"It must, must be..."

"Su, Mo."

After saying this, she made no sound for a very long time - so long that snow fell all over them, their hair and temples spotted with white.

Ning Fuyi held the already-cold body in her arms tightly, gently rocking as if she were still there.

The snow continued falling regardless. The mountains and rivers before them gradually darkened, covered in silver.

Author's Note: The Divine Venerable's alternate account has gone offline.

While writing this, I suddenly remembered something I saw online: "If we can share snow together in the future, this life can be considered growing old together."

Note: This chapter marks the end of Su Mo's mortal incarnation and represents one of the most emotionally devastating moments in the story, as Ning Fuyi loses the woman she loves for the second time, knowing this was necessary for Chu Qingqiu's soul to return complete.