

Chapter 4 - Brain Cancer

When Feng Yue returned to the hospital after lunch, she was directly led to the radiology department by the duty nurse.

The nurse said Doctor Wei was waiting for her there.

Upon hearing this, Feng Yue basically confirmed that her brain cancer had been detected.

Sure enough, when she arrived at the radiology department, not only was Wei Yuran waiting there, but also a slightly older middle-aged woman.

Seeing her arrive, Wei Yuran introduced: "Madam, this is Professor Fang from our hospital's neurosurgery department."

"Hello, I'm Feng Yue." Feng Yue put on a puzzled expression as she looked at Wei Yuran, as if asking why she needed to see a neurosurgery doctor.

Seeing this, Professor Fang handed Feng Yue the medical examination report in her hands and gently explained: "Miss Feng, this is your examination report. We found some issues in your test results, so you need to undergo a more detailed examination now so we can determine whether there's an error in the report."

Feng Yue seemed to freeze for a moment, then nodded after a while and followed the nurse for further examination.

After Feng Yue left, Wei Yuran quietly asked Professor Fang: "Aunt Fang, are you certain?"

Professor Fang sighed and nodded, with some reluctance on her face: "Based on the physical examination report, it's almost certainly the case. We'll know the specific results after she completes the detailed examination."

Wei Yuran's expression grew solemn, and he could only nod without saying anything more.

On the ceiling of the examination room was a bright incandescent lamp. Feng Yue lay calmly on the examination equipment, looking up.

Then the machine moved, and the incandescent lamp gradually disappeared from her view, replaced by the interior of the equipment.

Although she had lain on countless identical machines in her previous life, when she was alone being sent into the machine's interior, her heart still unconsciously began to tighten.

She was afraid.

Feng Yue's hands, resting at her sides, unconsciously gripped her goose-yellow dress, hoping this would help ease her inner tension and anxiety.

However, the examination was quick. Soon she was sent out by the examination machine, and the familiar incandescent lamp appeared before her eyes again.

The nurse pushed open the door and came in, helping her up: "Miss Feng, you can wait outside for the results now. Doctor Wei and Professor Fang are both waiting for you outside."

"Thank you." When Feng Yue spoke, she realized her voice had gone hoarse for a moment.

But the nurse seemed very understanding, smiled kindly at her, then led her out of the radiology room door.

Wei Yuran's office wasn't far from the radiology department, so after seeing Feng Yue come out, the two doctors suggested going to the office to wait for results. Feng Yue naturally had no objection.

The three didn't wait long in the office before the nurse from earlier came knocking on Wei Yuran's office door with Feng Yue's examination results.

Professor Fang took the results and began examining them carefully. After about half a moment, she handed the results to Wei Yuran while nodding with a serious expression.

Feng Yue watched their actions, and her heart was somewhat prepared.

Although she had known since the moment she woke up in this world that she couldn't escape brain cancer, who knew whether she had secretly hoped for a miracle in the depths of her heart?

Wei Yuran put down the results and nodded to Professor Fang, indicating she should announce the results, while he got up to pour a cup of warm water for Feng Yue.

Professor Fang had treated many such cases, so she spoke directly: "Miss Feng, I think you've probably guessed that there is indeed an issue with your examination report. We can now confirm that you have brain cancer. However, because it was discovered early and the cancer cells haven't spread, it's early-stage, so treatment started now is completely in time."

Feng Yue's expression was calm. When she took the paper cup that Doctor Wei handed her, she was still somewhat dazed.

How should she put it? This could be considered a blessing in disguise. It was still early-stage now, not completely hopeless like in her previous life.

If—if she had come for an examination at this time in her previous life, would the outcome have been completely different? But at that time, her heart was still focused solely on Yan Lin.

Thinking of this, Feng Yue's eyes gradually reddened, and her dark eyes filled with crystal-clear tears.

She was crying because she still had hope for salvation, but the two medical professionals present thought she was frightened and scared into tears.

However, Feng Yue only felt low for a moment before pulling herself together to ask Professor Fang about her condition.

In the eyes of Wei Yuran and Professor Fang, this was truly heartbreaking.

A girl only twenty-four or twenty-five years old, still able to calmly inquire about her situation after learning she had cancer—this was truly remarkable.

Feng Yue roughly discussed her condition with Professor Fang, who said she needed to carefully customize a treatment plan for Feng Yue and asked her to come to the hospital again in a few days.

Professor Fang also knew this disease couldn't be delayed—the earlier the surgery, the better—so after their conversation, she left.

Wei Yuran walked Feng Yue to the hospital entrance. After bidding him farewell and taking a step forward, Feng Yue turned back to instruct: "Doctor Wei, please keep my condition confidential from my parents."

Wei Yuran was startled, then said: "Don't worry, Madam."

Only after giving these instructions did Feng Yue leave the hospital with peace of mind. It wasn't that she didn't want to tell her parents, but she really couldn't bear to see them with the haggard appearance they had in her previous life again.

Her mother and father were originally two optimistic and cheerful people, but in her previous life, because of her illness, their hair had turned white from worry.

Since there was a possibility her condition could improve in this life, she was unwilling to let this matter trouble them again.

In the presidential suite of a five-star hotel on the other side of the ocean, it was quiet and peaceful. On the large bed in the bedroom, Yan Lin was sleeping soundly.

But for some unknown reason, the person who had been sleeping peacefully on the bed suddenly furrowed her brow, and a layer of fine, crystal-clear sweat appeared on her forehead.

The next second, Yan Lin suddenly opened her eyes and sat up abruptly from the bed, breathing heavily.

As soon as Yan Lin opened her eyes, she was met with complete darkness. She supported her forehead with one hand, trying hard to calm her emotions.

She remembered she hadn't turned off the bedside lamp when she went to sleep last night.

She should say that since Feng Yue's death, she hadn't slept with the lights off for too long.

Yan Lin habitually reached for the bedside lamp, but her hand touched nothing.

The lamp was gone?

Yan Lin grew puzzled. She no longer insisted on turning on the light, but instead reached for her phone, which she always placed beside her pillow.

She had been placing her phone by her pillow for years, and sure enough, she found it with one touch.

She lightly pressed with her finger, lighting up the screen.

3 AM.

Yan Lin's gaze moved down, and below the large time display...

July? She clearly remembered yesterday was just the winter solstice¹, and she had even gone home to have dinner with her parents!

Yan Lin's heart grew increasingly uneasy, and she opened the calendar.

2020, July 13th.

More than three years ago?

Yan Lin could hardly believe it. She put down her phone and, relying on her eyes that had barely adjusted to the darkness, began to examine her surroundings.

Looking around, Yan Lin could be certain this was definitely not her bedroom, but it also seemed somewhat familiar.

Yan Lin got out of bed and, using her phone's flashlight, found the room's light switch. The next second, the entire room finally became completely bright.

After turning on the lights, Yan Lin understood—this was probably a hotel.

More than three years ago, she remembered, was right around the time she had just taken over the company. July was also when a major company project was launching overseas.

Even now, she could still clearly remember some details of that project.

Yan Lin gripped her phone and pushed open the bedroom door to go outside. She remembered that when she stayed in hotels, she would always have an office space set up outside the bedroom, where all her necessary materials were placed.

Yan Lin walked out to the area outside the bedroom, and the office desk appeared directly in front of her. She walked over and casually picked up a document to open it. Sure enough, the name of that past project appeared on it.

She really had returned to more than three years ago.

Yan Lin sat dazedly in the chair, her thoughts in complete chaos. She wasn't unfamiliar with terms like time travel, but she didn't know why such a thing would happen to her.

But...

If she had now returned to more than three years ago, did that mean Feng Yue hadn't died yet?

At the thought of this possibility, Yan Lin's heart felt as if it were being tightly gripped by a hand, making it hard to breathe. Even her hand holding the phone began to tremble slightly.

She urgently opened her phone, preparing to contact Feng Yue, but when she was about to dial that call, she miraculously hesitated.

She inexplicably remembered the scene she had witnessed when rushing to the hospital—grieving parents, calm medical staff, and Feng Yue lying on the hospital bed as if peacefully asleep.

The hot blood surging through Yan Lin's body felt as if it had been doused with cold water. After being dazed for a while, she gradually returned to her usual cold, unapproachable demeanor.

Yan Lin sat leaning against the chair for quite a while before she began silently checking all her social media apps.

However, when she saw her chat history with Dai Shuangshuang, her expressionless face finally showed a ripple of emotion.

Full-body examination.

Yan Lin's gaze locked onto these words like a hawk. After thinking for a moment, she found Wei Yuran's phone number and dialed his cell phone.

It was afternoon in China, so Wei Yuran naturally answered her call quickly.

"Doctor Wei, this is Yan Lin." Yan Lin's cold voice traveled through the phone back to China across the ocean.

"Miss Yan." Wei Yuran was somewhat surprised by Yan Lin's call. This young lady spoke with him no more than a handful of times per year. "Is there something you need?"

"My wife went for a medical examination. How are the results?" After asking, Yan Lin fell silent, inexplicably finding herself somewhat afraid of the answer Wei Yuran was about to give her.

There was a moment of silence on the other end of the phone. Wei Yuran wasn't sure how to respond, but he only remained silent for a few seconds.

He was, after all, the Yan family's doctor. Moreover, Feng Yue had only instructed him not to tell her parents, and Miss Yan naturally wasn't included in that restriction.

Wei Yuran considered for a moment, then said: "Madam's preliminary examination shows early-stage brain cancer."

Yan Lin felt as if her throat had been gripped, unable to make any sound.

Although she had been mentally prepared, it was still very difficult to accept such results.

Wei Yuran had naturally handled many such situations, so he didn't ask questions but quietly waited for Yan Lin to collect her emotions.

Yan Lin's silence didn't last long. She continued hoarsely: "Continue."

Wei Yuran understood and then explained Professor Fang's general treatment plan to Yan Lin.

"How... how is she?"

Yan Lin's voice was very soft, so soft that Wei Yuran almost thought he had misheard.

But he still answered: "Madam seemed a bit frightened, but she's very strong. She just instructed me not to tell her parents about this before leaving."

"Mm, do as she says. Thank you for your hard work."

"This is what I should do."

After hanging up the phone, Yan Lin finally collapsed against the chair back as if all her strength had been drained. She covered her eyes with one hand.

This light was really too harsh.

Footnotes:

¹ Winter solstice (冬至) - An important traditional Chinese festival marking the shortest day and longest night of the year, typically occurring around December 21-22. It's a time for family reunions and eating traditional foods like dumplings in northern China or tangyuan (glutinous rice balls) in southern China.
